Dorothy Dix On Lazy Women

The Philosophy of Peter Plunkett Worsted in a Battle Over Taxation Without Representation.

ONE of the chief causes that enable doctors to set up automobiles, masseurs to open bank accounts and complexion wash makers to become millionaires is the laziness of women," said a fashionable doctor. "There isn't a physician in the whole country doing a good practice who doesn't really live on the laziness of women."

"Women with flabby skins, lackluster eyes and lifeless hair flock to him, complaining of sleeplessness, nervousness, headache, or indigestion. Nearly always it is a plain case of too much to eat and not enough to do, and if the doctor gave a candid opinion he would say:

"My dear madame, you are suffering from a chronic case of laziness and my prescription is to go to work."

"Of course, he doesn't make any such unpolemic remark. He knows women dote on drugs and adore being doted, so he gives some harmless prescription and advises golf or something else of the kind. If he can get his patient to take the exercise she gets well, and goes through the length and breadth of the town sounding the praise of Dr.

LAZY LIVER, BILIOUSNESS, HEADACHE, COATED TONGUE OR A BAD STOMACH.

You men and women who somehow can't get feeling right—who have an almost daily headache, coated tongue, foul taste and foul breath, dizziness, can't sleep, are nervous and upset, bothered with a sick, gassy, disordered stomach, or have backache and feel all worn out.

Are you keeping clean inside with Cascarets—or merely forcing a passageway every few days with salts, cathartic pills or castor oil? This is important.

Cascarets immediately cleanse and regulate the stomach, remove the sour, undigested and fermenting food and foul gases; take the excess bile from the liver and carry off the decomposed waste matter and poison from the intestines and bowels.

A Cascaret tonight will straighten you out by morning—a 10-cent box will keep your entire family feeling good for months. Don't forget the children—their little insides need a good, gentle cleansing, too.

Cureall's pills. Other anaemic and lazy women follow in her wake to his door and his fortune is made.

Women's Bewetting Sin.
"In my opinion, the besetting sin of women is laziness. Does anything else account for the way they congregate in hotels and boarding houses, except the fact that they are too lazy to keep house? Because they dread the worry and work of seeing about meals and dealing with incompetent servants, they deny themselves all the sweet privacy of a home. Yet there is no other such deadly and relentless foe to a woman's good looks and health as the boarding habit."

"Once let a woman acquire it, and not all the lotions and beautifiers in the world are going to enable her to keep her figure and complexion. Think of the daily routine, with its aimless motoring, and cease to wonder that it makes invalids."

"Madame gets up late in the morning, with no definite purpose in view but getting through the day. She descends languidly to breakfast, and that over, lounges in the parlor until her room is set in order. Perhaps, if she feels very energetic, she gets on the street car and rides to town to make a patient and long-suffering clerk amuse her by pulling down piles of goods while she indulges in the pastime known as shopping for samples. Then she goes home to lunch, dawdles through the afternoon, eats enough for a workingman at dinner, and at bedtime finds herself the victim of insomnia. Is it any wonder that nature revenges itself for such an outrageous life by giving her a sallow complexion and a rebellious liver?"

Aftermath.
"Of course, before long her mirror tells her she has gone off in looks, and she hies away to the complexion specialist, who steams her and kneads her and plasters her over with pastes and lotions, but there is no counteracting the look of a greasy, flabby rash of good, red blood through her veins, the strong and supple muscles, speak for themselves and are not to be mistaken for rouge and flabby skin."

"The woman who is the victim of boarding wonders how it is that poor Mary or Sally, who is only moderately well off and has to do so much of her own work, keeps her complexion and looks so young and so healthy. She, who has nothing on earth to do and has every luxury, is grown hopelessly stout and ugly."

"It doesn't occur to her that work in moderation, without worry, is the very best blessing that ever befell the human race. She looks upon work as an unmitigated curse, and responsibility as an evil she is perfectly justified in shrinking from. Whether she can. Yet all the ingenuity of man has never been able to devise any scheme of exercise as good for the general human race as old-fashioned every day work."

"Another potent cause of ill health among women who have nothing to do," continued the doctor, reverting to his original topic, "is that they have too much time to think about themselves. That is the worst enemy a woman has on earth. The woman who is too physically lazy to keep house or keep up some systematic occupation is generally too mentally lazy to care really to use her mind. She is given to silly and sentimental novel reading, and she varies this diversion by imagining that she is ill."

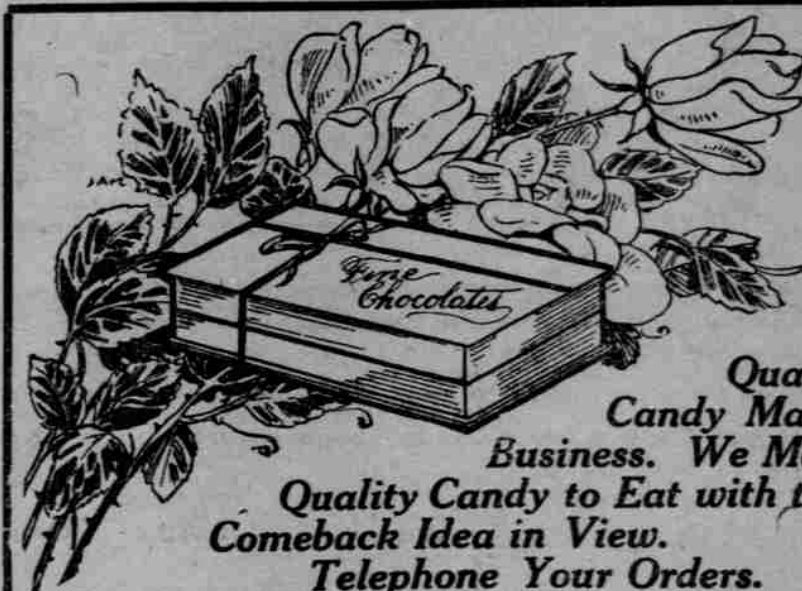

The Favorite Disease.
"Of course, she doesn't feel well. Nobody could who lived such an existence. Then she begins to canvass her system for signs of disease. Most likely she decides on nervous prostration, which has an air of dealing with glittering generalities and is a handy amateur kind of disease to have, because it doesn't often interfere with the things you want to do. Anyway, she has no trouble in launching herself on an expensive career as an invalid, that forbids anything so heartless as the mere suggestion of going to work and doing something useful."

"Now," concluded the doctor, snapping together his prescription blanks, "I'm not making a general charge of laziness against the whole sex. I know plenty of women who could give points to the little busy bee about improving each shining hour, but I do say that a large part of the sickness among women and much of the ugliness is the direct result of laziness. If every woman would make her own beds and sweep her own floors every morning, there would be a little need for masseurs and physical culture classes, and a lot of us doctors would have to take in our signs and hunt for other occupations."

THE COUNTERPLOT, DAILY SHORT STORY

outside this house three long hours ago.

"Dick!"

Grante's squinting gaze was on me. Imporingly, then, he asked me, but I went on, shaking my head.

"I recognized a woman—a woman whose evil face and evil fame I remembered. An angel after young men, after rapid, foolish youths with more money than sense. She came to me and suggested my taking the place of her absent husband. During dinner I—remember my faintness—I bribed a passing errand boy to carry a penciled note to a friend of mine. In consequence the bishop received a telegram."

"You confess that you're an impostor," bawled Sir James. "That you have played a part in this false pretence—this conspiracy? D'ye think we're fools enough to believe your cack-and-bull story? What possible object had you—a stranger—in lending your name to this criminal deception?"

"Lies—lies!" screamed Grante, and suddenly he stood up, rocking toe and heel.

"Dick, you're mad! You're taking leave of your senses! My dear boy, a joke's a joke. However much you dislike your relatives (who have done so much for you), you mustn't—"

I could not help admiring the candor that he threw into his tone, his wonderful mastery over himself, his resource.

"I have a friend in the detective force in Paris. I went on, ignoring him. 'I knew him years ago—when I was young enough to be almost taken in by Lulu. My friend cabled to him to visit the villa Monte Rosa and make inquiries about Dick Kelvinside. His discoveries (if any) were to be wired to the bishop here. I wanted to have a full confession from Mr. Grante before we called in the police.'"

"Very ingenious," sneered Sir James. "But the police make two captures, my friend. Because you've quarreled with your accomplices and have given the show away, you'll not escape scot free."

"My dear Sir James," I answered smiling, "I think not."

"We'll see," he roared, and stumbled to his feet, crossing the room to the window and flinging it open.

"As you suggest," I added, "it would have been foolish in a stranger to mix himself up in such a dubious proceeding. But as it happens I was making for No. 20 myself when Miss Lulu arrived, and I only intended to give her time to get in before ringing myself."

But events made me suspicious—very suspicious—and I determined to play the hand out. I have played it out, and I think you'll admit that I've beaten this rogue here."

Grante's face was livid and his lips were twitching. He sank down in a chair. One hand pressed to his side, the other covering his eyes.

Sir James, seeing a policeman and roared out to him to come in. I heard the man's hurried feet on the steps, and one of the bishop's sons went out into the hall to open the door.

"But, you see, I'm not a stranger," I said sweetly, as the officer's gruff voice sounded from the hall. "I had an intimate interest in the evening's work. I've heard a lot of home truths which have endeared my relatives to me immensely. I hope I shall see as much (or as little) of them in the future as I have in the past. You knew me no more than Lulu did. Little Billee, as she called me, was merged some years ago into another name."

I paused, smiled on them all, feeling very comfortable, as I added: "I'm Rogate."
